Reifert lived with his son, George, whose family declares that there could be ne other motive than despondency.

Reifert was a tailor by trade, and had been out of work several months. He seemed to worry a great deal and his conduct of late had been somewhat irrational.

This morning at 5 o'clock his son George, on returning from a ball, found his father's dead body hanging from the transom of his bedroom. SOUGHT DEATH TOGETHER.

There is a good reason for the large business the Hammerslough Bros. are doing. They manufacture their own goods and, selling them direct to the consumer, can put them in at a figure that is amazingly low. Imagine a complete suit of clothes for 19. That's the price. Their retail establishment has no expense, and as a result the consumer obtains the benefit of the wholesale rate. There was very little in the stock market in the late trading outside of the Industrials. The bears raided Distiliers and knocked the price down to 10 1-4, the lowest ever touched. Sugar was also pressed for sale and Gas and Electric held barely steady. The first mentioned broke badly, touching 37 1-8.

The great feature, however, was the sensational break in Distiliers, better known as the Whiskey Trust. The continued decline forced sales on "stop" orders, and the losses must be enormous. The dealings at intervals were attended with considerable excitement. Fresident Greenhut, of the Trust, was reported to be ill, and the old rumor of a receivership was revived. Many of the traders have fared so badly that they will give the stock a wide berth hereafter.

The body, evidently that of an American laborer, was removed to the Morgue, where an autopsy will be performed some time to-day.

The only clue that is furnished to identify the murdered man is the tattooed marks on the left forearm and upon the breast, "J. S., 186", and "J. S., "accompanied by a cross, respectively.

In the pockets of the dead man's clothing were found 40 cents in money and a Chinese laundry ticket. The presence of the money precludes the motive of murder for robbery.
